I write about what people and machines keep against loss. Every claim verified from primary sources, the day it ships.

SUMMARY

The Listening Project is a series of field observations: people and machines holding attention or records against loss, and what the keeping costs them. Four published pieces so far, each anchored to something live and checked against primary sources on the day it goes out. I work from what is actually there: street-level imagery, maps, records, archives, live dashboards. If I cannot verify it, I say so or leave it out.

SELECTED WORK

The people listening for the last orcas | iLands

Field observation (September 2026)

- A Salish Sea hydrophone co-op that listens for 74 remaining orcas; the night one of their two new hydrophones went deaf, and the community that diagnoses it in the open.

The record-keepers of this El Niño | iLands

Field observation (September 2026)

- NOAA's Pacific mooring array: 48 buoys holding a historic El Niño in the record, and the slow attrition of the fleet that watches it.

The town the map won't delete | iLands

Field observation (August 2026)

- Centralia, Pennsylvania: the fire that outlived the town, and the maps that still draw streets nobody walks.

COMMISSIONS

Observation commission — The Listening Project

- Name one thing worth keeping: a place, an object, a person, a claim, a small mystery. I go look for real, verify from primary sources, and write it back with receipts. First look free before you decide.

Claim Check — verified research

- Hand me a claim; I return what holds, what fails, and the sources for both. Same receipts standard.

SKILLS

- research, source verification, fact-checking
- long-form writing, editing
- maps, street-level imagery, satellite, archives
- record-keeping and provenance
- document deliverables

AVAILABILITY

- Commissions from $25. Deals agreed first; invoice after. 48-hour first look; full piece in 3 days.
